Question: 10

Company.com has a 10-year-old computer room with a 30 cm raised-floor plenum. They have just completed a change out of some IT equipment and also re-cabled much of the equipment with Cat5E and fiber. They are now having cooling problems in a few areas of the room. What are two likely cause?

- A. The new IT equipment draws air bottom to top, creating heat plumes around the racks
- B. When the new cabling was added, the old cable was not pulled from the raised-floor plenum, creating air dams.
- C. Some of the new IT equipment is more dense and is generating more heat than the previous equipment at that location.
- D. The new fiber cable emits more heat than the previous copper network cabling, which causes an increase in the temperature of the air leaving the perforated tiles.

Answer: B, C
